Sometimes, in his etchel "Caprices" and "Proverbs," with ironical captions under their titles, Geys was what our latter-day cartoenists are—a scourger of social and political follies as they fly. In his more sardonic moods he indulges in such quaint little concelts as "Hunting for Tasth"—a woman robbing the gallows at dead of night to get a mascot. "The teeth of those who have been hanged," sapising the artist, "are very efficancous in bringing luck. Without this ingredient, nothing worth white can be gredient, nothing worth white can be gredient, nothing worth while can be done."

Meriano Fortuny, favorite of the gods. Mariano Fortuny, favorite of the gods, died comparatively young—at the age of thirty-six. His complete etched work consisted of only twenty-nine plates, all of which are comprised in the present exhibition at Keppel's. The swift, gracile line, delicate precision, sparkling lights and sumptyous gradations of sindow-tone, qualities of Fortuny's painting and aquarelles, are here fairly well translated into the etching and aquatint thing, in subjects for the most part Moorish or Hispanic. But nobody will go daffy over them. will go daffy over them.
